

our athletes the manliness of thought; or as giving a field to the more bookish of our body to air themselves—such a society must raise the tone of the School where it exists. And when one adds this to the advantages already enumerated in the social changes it should effect, one is tempted to ask “Where then is the perfection of our School, if it is unable to support such an institution? Does not the absence of it imply a real want of literary power?” For the House Debating Societies do not really supply the need. In a house it is impossible to get enough members on the same footing, as regards age and position to ensure a real bona fide division. It is impossible but that meeting on the same ground, and under the same leadership as they have met during the week, they should occupy to one another the same relation. In other words, the “Swells” of the house are sure to have it all their own way, and though this may be all very well, and may ensure great success for didactic purposes, the maieutic which is the great point of a debate is sure to be banished. Otherwise, a house debating society is able to choose its own times considerably easier than one which must meet when all the School can be at large.

Finally, we would not be misunderstood as blaming house debating societies: they are excellent institutions, particularly during the long evenings of the winter term; they bind the smaller and bigger fellows in a house together; they interest and bring on the younger fellows. But they do not take the place of a school debating society; for instead of doing away with petty house feeling they are apt to increase it, and instead of educating the older fellows or swells of the house, they teach them to lay down the law on all points without any sufficient chance of well-considered contradiction.

THE RACQUET COURT.

A question of considerable importance has been started of late, and it is one which we cannot disregard, however it may cut into institutions which may hold their power mainly because the memory of man speaketh not to the contrary. Now and then we are compelled to do disagreeable things, but we must not flinch from doing them merely because they are disagreeable, if we have a good object in view. The matter to which we allude is simply this—a marker is almost a necessity at a Racquet Court like ours; it is usual that the marker has the monopoly of articles in use at the Courts; and this monopoly is at present held by the cricket professional. It is, doubtless, a delicate matter for us to verge upon, and we trust that those whom it concerns will take it up, from a desire to improve the style and play of Racquet players in the School. As we have said, our cricket professional enjoys a monopoly of the sale of Racquets and balls. Now this is a monopoly which should never have been his, when we consider how men devote their lives to racquets, as well as cricket, in the expectation of getting an appointment as marker at a good court. As regards the advantages of a racquet professional, they must already have suggested themselves to the minds of all—improvement in style, which we fear is sadly wanted in School players,—knowledge of the game, without which no perfection can be attained. And who can deny the influence which the example of a really good player has upon youthful aspirants. At present there is no one who can at all give an example, except the honorary members and the best School players. Now suppose there were no one to teach us cricket except the Eleven, who are the very class who themselves require coaching to bring them to perfection: so, too, with Racquets; a little coaching would give a finish to our best players, and vastly improve the education of the more unlearned.

And here it may not be out of place to say a few words about the Racquet Club. Since its members have such a command of the Court, on the same principle that members of Big-Side pay more taxes than those of Little-Side, should not they, too, pay a small terminal subscription to pay the salary of a marker? We have heard that those honorary members who take advantage of their membership, are most cordial in their support of the proposal, and have signified their intention of promoting the bonum publicum to an extent far out of proportion to their use of the Court. Such being the case, it is our duty to take the matter in hand; and having met with such support, we should not be surprised to see a marker down before many weeks are over.

NATURAL HISTORY SOCIETY.

A meeting of this Society was held on May 9th. A paper by G. B. Longstaff, on “Caterpillars,” was read by the Secretary. Footsteps from the New Red Sandstone were exhibited by F. R. Smith, and explained by E. Cleminshaw.

Among the exhibitions were Fossils from the Suffolk Cross with notes on the Crag, by A. G. Ogilvie ; and a badger lately taken in Wiltshire, with a description by N. Masterman.

A case of Indian Insects was presented by F. Lefroy, and books were given by various donors. The following have been elected, F. R. Smith, to keep the Botanical Album ; J. M. Gordon and J. Baynes members, and S. Davies associate.

The next meeting will be on May 23rd, at 8 o'clock.

THE RIFLE CORPS.

WE had hoped by this time to be an enrolled corps, and to be in possession of a new range ; but we have been disappointed, and have to put up with constant delay without any remedy in our hands. It is doubtless dispiriting to be losing so much valuable time, but at any rate that time has been well spent, as we see that the musters have been well attended and that the drill is considerably improved. As regards shooting, an eleven from Christ Church, Oxford, propose paying us a visit next Thursday, when we shall have to shoot our best if we wish to be victorious. A simultaneous match is also being arranged with Trinity College, Cambridge, which will probably take place about the end of the month. Twenty-five members have already fired their third class, the highest score made being that of Corporal Whiting,—

On Thursday last, May 14th, Mr. Baldwin's Challenge Cup was competed for, and won, after an exceedingly good match, by Private Cobham, who made a very fair score of 43 points. Sergt. Humphry was second with 41 points. The shooting was very good at 200 yards, not a single miss being made by any of the competitors.

THE SCHOOL MAGAZINES.

The Cheltonian for May is emphatically Cheltonian. By this we imply that it contains very little to draw the attention of a stranger. We get a good description of the Racquet Matches at Prince's, and a long account of their Races ; the rest of the number being filled with Racquets, Fives, Boating, &c.

The Eton Chronicle celebrates its 100th number, by presenting its readers with a plan of Eton College. Eton has seven old choices for the Eleven this year.

The Malburian (May 15). The articles are, Editorial ; the Irish Church ; Music, its nature and worth ; the River of Life. It informs us and its readers that we have a man to keep our cricket ground, whose name is Fred. We are sorry our contemporary did not transcribe so alarming a piece of intelligence rightly. Marlborough scored 232 against Balliol College, Oxford. The Marlborough ground must indeed be advantageous for run-getting, as we notice hits sometimes get 9, often 8 and 7.

Haileybury has shown decided pluck in sending forth a Magazine, the first number of which was issued in March. The papers are well written, and with good support the magazine will prosper. The following is cleverly written, and we venture to quote :—

ALPHABETICA EDITORIANA.

- A was the Author, just rising sixteen ;
- B was the Box of the new Magazine ;
- C the Contents, as they first met the eye ;
- D the Depression occasioned thereby.
- E was the Editors' fond Expectation.
- F was their Failure to feel admiration.
- G was the Ghost of its chance to succeed ;
- H the "more haste" that engendered "worse speed."
- I was the author's Ink, blacker than night ;
- J was his Mitchell-pen, peerless to write.
- K was the Knotty point how to begin ;
- L was the Lack of ideas flowing in.
- M was the Man who thought fit to pooh, pooh !
- N was the Never he said it would do.
- O was the Oil by the Author consumed ;
- P was the Praise in the distance that loomed ;
- Q was the Quiz who nor pitied nor spared ;
- R was the single Rush nobody cared.
- S was the Spelling of one poor 'rejected' ;
- T was the Tiptoe on which he expected.
- U are the Public—don't turn up your eyes, For (V) its no Vunder that b'ys will be b'ys.
- W's a Writer whose wits seem precarious :
- X, Y, and Z are his signatures various.

The Athletic Rules Committee, we hear, have adjourned their meetings till next Term.

The following rule with regard to taking Ends and Fivescourts was passed at a Sixth
